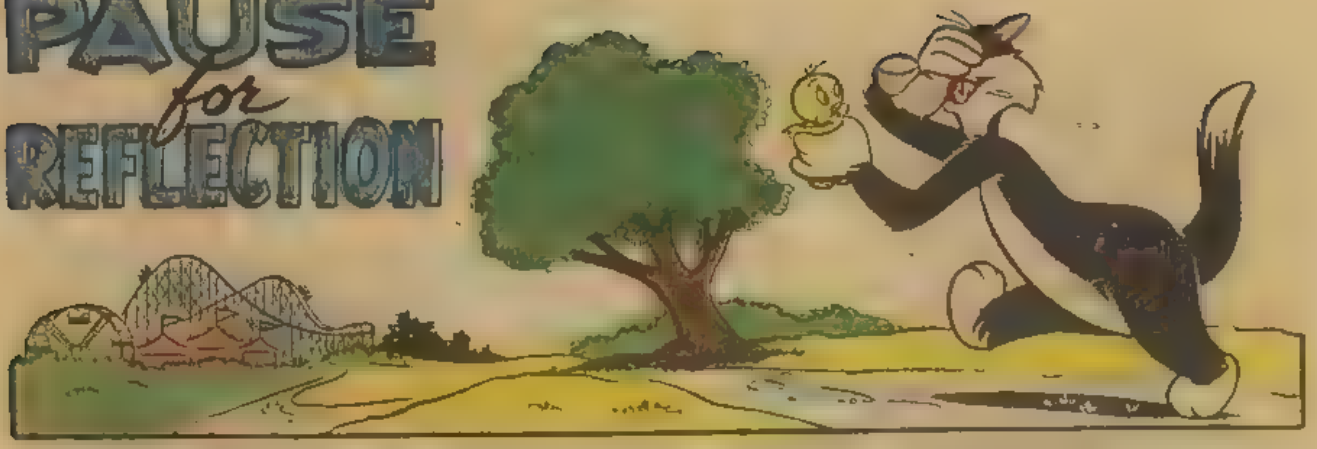
PAUSE for REFLECTION



One day, Tweety was flying high above a beautiful meadow when he caught a momentary glimpse of a familiar figure skulking behind a clump of tall bushes.

"Hmm, I tot I taw a puddy tat," he mumbled to himself.

As Tweety swooped down to investigate, Sylvester, who had been waiting, leaped up and snatched him from mid-air.

"Ah, ha!" Sylvester gloated. "I've been waiting here all day to invite you to dinner. And the best part is that you're going to be the dinner."

"Tsk, tsk!" Tweety said disapprovingly. "If you could only see what a mean old puddy you are, Sylvester, you wouldn't like it one teensy-weensy bit."

"Flattery will get you nowhere, bub," Sylvester grinned, licking his chops in eager anticipation. "Besides," he added, "everyone knows what a fine fellow I am."

Tweety sighed. "What about the way you're always jumping out at defenseless little tweety birds. You scowl and show your big bwight teeth and scare us half to death!"

Sylvester blinked with surprise. Somehow, he'd never thought of himself as being frightening to anybody. He scowled, and howled, and showed his teeth at the thought.

"Ooooh!" Tweety shrieked with alarm. "You look tewwible, Sylvester. I certainly wish you could see yourself."

"Bah! Don't worry about me, juicy," Sylvester snorted. "Let's just get along home and fix ourselves a nice Tweetyburger for dinner."

"Wait!" Tweety pleaded. "Why be satisfied with one tweety bird when I know where you can see at least a dozen?"

"You wouldn't fool a poor hungry kitty, now would you, sport?" Sylvester leered.

"Of course not," Tweety said indignantly. "Us tweety birds have a stwict code of honor. Now cover your eyes and I'll tell you where to walk. I don't want to give away my secwet place until the last minute."

"Okay," Sylvester agreed, covering his eyes. "Heh, heh! This is fun."

Following Tweety's instructions, Sylvester walked first this way, then that way, then a longer ways this way and a still longer ways that way. At last, after what seemed like hours to Sylvester, Tweety announced, "Here we are, puddy. You can open your eyes now."

"It sure is noisy around here," Sylvester mumbled as he took his hand away from his eyes. "YEOW!" he yelped with pleasure, staring at the walls around him. Everywhere he looked he could see cats holding little yellow tweety birds in their paws.

"I don't know where all the cats came from," Sylvester said greedily, "but I'll just help myself to the tweety birds they're holding!"

Sylvester lunged forward, but all the other cats lunged forward, too, until Sylvester ran smack into a solid wall.

"What a frightening sight to have all those cats lunging at me!" Sylvester gulped."What kind of a place is this, anyhow?"

"Tee-hee!" Tweety giggled, slipping out of Sylvester's trembling hand. "I told you if you could just see yourself as others see you, you wouldn't like it one bit. The next time you think about being mean to a tweety bird," Tweety called over his shoulder as he flew off, "just pause to weflect on what you looked like in the Hall of Mirrors here at the Fun House, today!"
